PERSPECTIVE ON COLDS and FLU

According to Traditional Chinese Medicine (TCM), most colds and flu result from run-down resistance, as well as from various external or environmental factors, such as Wind, Cold, Heat, Dampness, and other pathogens. It is these external pathogens and under-lying conditions that TCM addresses in dealing with colds and flu.

Principles of treatment for colds and flu in TCM are to expel the external pathogens and to rebalance and restore general health. External pathogens, especially Wind-Cold and Wind-Heat, usually remain in the superficial areas of the body such as the skin, muscles, nose, throat, and so on, after invading the body. Failure to expel these pathogens with proper remedies in the early stage will result in their going more deeply into the body, even into organs such as the lungs, stomach, gallbladder, or urinary bladder. That is why it is best to deal with colds and flu symptoms from the onset in their first few days.

TCM remedies must be chosen to match the pathogens, the underlying conditions, and the symptoms. If conditions become more severe or complicated, it is best to consult a professional practitioner.

There are various remedies for colds and flu in TCM. They are all especially valuable because they are effective and safe. Also, generally they have no side effects and do not lead to secondary infections. After thousands of years of usage, there is no evidence of any development of resistance to these herbs and formulas by external pathogens.
